

Las Hijas de los Días: 7 Female Views from the Margins

Cristina de Middel and Lola del Fresno present their work in a collective exhibition curated by Begoña Torres at Santa Monica's 18th Street Arts Center.

Science affirms that we are made out of atoms, but Uruguayan writer Eduardo Galeano states that we're also made out of stories. In his book, Los hijos de los días (Children of the Days), he writes one story that reflects the feelings and vicissitudes for every day of a year.

Inspired by this exercise, the exhibition set out to reflect on relevant ideas that inhabit our daily lives in only a week's span of time across the globe. To represent each day of the week, they selected the gazes of seven women from 18th Street Arts Center, PhotoEspaña, and Arttextum that reflect the spirit of our times, starting with photography as a medium of departure and expanding the field to include drawing, installation, and performance.

Climate unrest, the physical displacement of the idea of home, and the removal of socio-historical ties that oppress women were the stories told by the Spanish contemporary artists Cristina de Middel and Lola del Fresno, among others. The works of these creative women narrate challenging stories of our everyday that call out to be heard and comprehended in order to transform realities collectively. The women highlighted in this show are only a fraction of the multiple voices around the world who are tracking alternate ways of belonging to time.
