

'Storming Times Square' by Daniel Canogar

A project that symbolically releases our fantasies of overcoming imposed obstacles in our lives.

Using methods of public intervention and video installation, Storming Times Square is born from a desire to have viewers project themselves, literally and metaphorically, onto their immediate environments. Engaging individuals as spectators and participants, a staged interaction will take place between a “stormed” site and collected imagery of a virtual public.

During the first phase of the project in July, participants were invited to crawl and be creative over a green-screen surface while being captured by an overhead video camera. The result will be a dynamic video animation with both realistic and abstract forms that will be screened on led billboards in Times Square every night of september at midnight. In this way participants will become part of the moving image artwork, with their movements layered with others to form a collective work of moving bodies.
