

'Happily Ever After'

'Scenes of Love, Marriage and the Battle of Sexes' at the World Premiere of Cristina Colmena's play at the Ambassador Theater in Washington, D.C.

There is nothing but troubles and desire

SYNOPSIS

One and one not always equals two. The couple and its complicated arithmetic through three stories where characters want to be happy but they don't know how. When you get stood up, when you wake up beside a stranger, when after thirty years you don't know what to speak about. The loneliness of sleeping alone and of sleeping with someone. Why one plus one may equal nothing?

Three couples of different ages, representing a lifetime of romantic struggles, are crippled by fears and insecurities and unable to find fulfilment in love. We see young lovers bound by a powerful attraction yet destined to part; cynical middle aged 'one night standers' failing to act on a promising encounter; and an older, deeply unhappy couple keeping up appearances after thirty years of marriage.

The compelling dark comedy and its high emotional resonance present a chance for self-reflection and an opportunity to learn from the characters' mistakes. All three 'un-love' stories are poignant reminders that if we keep sitting on the fence, fearful and pessimistic, happiness may never come!

The play was written in 2013 by Cristina Colmena, a writer and playwright born in Spain, currently living in New York. She writes short stories, articles and film reviews. Her plays, Typing and Happily Ever After, were included in the New Plays from Spain series as part of the PEN World Voices Festival 2013.
